

Is That Knock On Your Door Cause For Alarm?

Protect Yourself From Fraud

If you are home during the day, you are more likely to meet door-to-door salespersons. While some door-to-door salespersons are honest, the chances are excellent that whoever answers the door is about to be ripped off. Door-to-door con artists are charming and friendly. Their smiles are inviting. They are successful because they seem so honest.

Door-to-door con artists often:

- Greet you by name to seem friendly.
- Use tricks to get into your home. They might imply they are from your alarm company and need to test or upgrade your system.
- Offer a free upgrade or free system– Check the fine print you will pay for the system somehow.
- Pressure you to make a decision. They may say the offer is only good that day.

Help prevent these problems for yourself and others by reporting unlicensed companies and individuals.

You Have a Right to Cancel

If you change your mind within three business days, you can get out of a door to door sales contract and receive a full refund. This is called the cooling-off period. Along with your contract or receipt, you should be given two copies of a cancellation form that you need to sign, date and mail. You don't have to have any reason for canceling. If you didn't get a cancellation form, write a letter. Because the seller broke the law by not giving you a cancellation form, you have extra time to cancel. You still must cancel in writing. The sooner you do this, the better.

Local License Often Required

A salesperson who visits your home may be required to have a peddlers, sales or solicitors license or permit.

Check with the consumer protection office in your locality for more information.

Protect yourself

The best safeguard against faulty and hazardous work is to make sure the company you hire has a valid license from the State Police.

Do NOT accept just a company ID!

Ask to see their license!

- Check with the Better Business Bureau or consumer affairs office.
- Read the information carefully to be sure you know what the quoted price includes.

Maryland Consumers Have Registered Many Complaints, Including:

- Customer unwittingly agreed to pay for fines charged to the unlicensed company and/or lengthy terms.
- Companies claim to represent the customer's existing alarm company, and falsely tell the customer that they need an upgrade. After the customer signs, they become obligated to two companies for the same services.
- Companies claim to offer a "free" system when in reality customers are committing to an extended contract that has a built in fee for the equipment.
